TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 26, 1893.

A WAITER WITH SMALL-POX.—Mary Morrison, while suffering from small-pox, waited upon customers in a restaurant in Boston during the past week, and each night slept with two other women. On Saturday afternoon the waiter was taken to the pest house. About two weeks ago Miss Morrison appeared at the restaurant, where she was given employment as a waitress. She was very reticent concerning herself, and the only thing she would say was that her home was in Nova Scotia, and that she had a room on Shawmut avenue. One week ago Saturday night she was sick all night, but was better Sunday.

Sunday night she was again very sick, and Monday morning a doctor was called, who thought she had the grip. She told the doctor that she had been vaccinated. Tuesday afternoon Miss Morrison went down to the restaurant, assisted about the work until evening, when she again went to her room.

Wednesday morning her landlady noticed several blotches on the girl's face and hands, but when she referred to them the girl seemed to resent it. Miss Morrison worked in the restaurant all that day, still complaining, however, of feeling very ill.

Thursday the girl worked nearly all day, and Friday morning when she went to the room she occupied on Shawmut avenue she was pale and weak.

The doctor was again called, and pronounced the disease to be small-pox. Then Miss Morrison confessed that she had not been vaccinated. Saturday morning a board of health physicians called and unhesitatingly pronounced it a case of small-pox. The ambulance was immediately sent for and the girl taken to the pest house. She was out of the restaurant nearly all day Friday.
